

The Food Fight Continues

We had some good news last week. Michelle Obama is having a garden built on the White House Grounds. An article, "Is a Food Revolution Now in Season?", appeared in the NY Times Business section on March 22. It seems some in the large farming and agribusiness camp are getting nervous about the trend of locally grown food and cuts in subsidies for them. It's almost laughable to see someone mentioned in the article worrying that locally grown organic foods "may be too expensive". I guess they haven't taken a stroll in a supermarket lately or they would see that even non-organic, mass produced foods are expensive.
